laminar air flow (laf)

[lam'iner]

Etymology: L, lamina, plate; Gk, aer; AS, flowan

a system of circulating filtered air in parallel-flowing planes in hospitals or other health care facilities. The system reduces the risk of airborne contamination and exposure to chemical pollutants in surgical theaters, food preparation areas, hospital pharmacies, and laboratories.

Mosby's Medical Dictionary, 9th edition. © 2009, Elsevier.

laminar air flow

Filtered air moving along separate parallel flow planes to surgical theaters, patient rooms, nurseries, bacteriology work areas, or food preparation areas. This method of air flow helps to prevent bacterial contamination and collection of hazardous chemical fumes in areas where they would pollute the work environment.
